

Accessing the Mind of God

God is like a giant mind and body. In that mind there are countless tiny synapses that connect each part of the mind to all the other parts. These synapses are located in various parts of the mind and each receives different sensory information which is fed into the mind from various parts of the body. This information is then permanently stored in memory cells of the mind. These memories collectively comprise the self-identity of the entire mind.

Our human body and soul may be likened to the separate parts of the larger body. I might look and function as a toe, and you a right index finger, and so on. Each of us, though distinct and different from one another, are still members of a single body, and we all have access to the mind or brain of that body. If we were to give a name to the entire body, including the brain, some would call it the universe. Some might call the brain God, and call the rest of the body the universe. Some of us might not believe that a brain exists which controls the entire body or universe. Some of us might believe that although the brain exists, it is not directly connected with the various body parts. But, of course, they would be wrong. They would be under the illusion that these connections do not exist and that the brain has no direct control over them.

As with any body part, the individual cells that make us up, and give us our identity, continually die and are replaced by new ones. It cannot be said that the body part I inhabited and formed my identity years ago actually exists today. All of my individual cells have been replaced, except, of course, my brain cells which never actually die. My brain cells are directly connected to the nerve cells of the larger body, and ultimately to the synapses in the big brain, to which we are all connected.

Interestingly, although I am a small body part, my individual experiences do have a significant impact on the entire body. Last year, I crushed my big toe and lost the toe nail. Believe me. My entire body and brain felt the impact of that injury, and it took a year for it to completely heal. The same is true of my entire existence. When my life goes bad, the entire body to which I am attached is negatively affected. The reverse is true when my life goes well and as planned. I believe that as individual members of the larger body, we are more important to the overall scheme of things than most of us realize. I remember someone once saying, that greatest honor may be given to even the least of the body parts.

Because of the interconnectedness of those body parts, I wonder if it might theoretically be possible for me to gain access to information contained in the memory cells of the brain. I have been told by someone I trust, who has actually accomplished this, that it is indeed possible for me to do so. According to this friend, it is possible me to expand the reach of my awareness by fine-tuning the nerve connections between my body and the brain that controls everything. The frequency that seems to most efficiently connect everything together, and form new pathways to that control center, is love.

The love frequency not only connects everything together, but it also holds everything together. Love heals not only the wounds sustained by me, the big toe, but also the pains of the entire body. Love is more important than knowledge. In other words, it is not important that I understand how or why it works, only that it works. Love is more important than guidance, because guidance can only show you the correct door to open. It is love that actually opens the door, and it also opens all the new doors that present themselves to you after going through the first door. Love is more important than religious rituals and dogmas, because it provides the deeper truths of which they are only representations. However, love is not more important than charity, because charity and human kindness are the means by which love is expressed.
